CPD at Bournemouth University
Tim Calvert. Academic Liaison Librarian (SciTech)

A new focus on training: developing CPD at Bournemouth University

➢ Being by the seaside: setting the scene

➢ The 'Inspired' programme at BU

➢ Developing a CPD 'Inspired' libguide

➢ Friday sessions: expanding the content and experimenting with formats

➢ Facilitating training beyond the library?

The Library at BU

- Split campus – town and country.
- Small library team.
- Located in Academic Services
- Inspired programme on Friday mornings
- Recording sessions for town centre staff

Welcome to Inspired from Chris Fowler, Head of Library and Learning Support.

Continuing Professional Development (CPD) is a phrase that covers a lot of things. The word 'professional' is a bit of a misnomer but generally indicates that this is about 'work' development. CPD doesn't have to be narrow or boring – it's about your own development and you have influence on where it goes.

CPD applies to everyone, no matter what your role in Academic Services. The BU appraisal process is one way that we support development for everyone. CPD includes surfing across many strands of information ranging from the staff intranet - to email lists - to blogs- to social media and to physical networking with real people. It takes many forms! The way we get that information varies so much and it's important to set aside time to dive in and find out what's happening in our work world. You can be structured about this or use serendipity in your approach!

We would like to think our users are 'digitally literate' but they may not be. Part of our CPD has to involve finding out how to deliver services to users (staff and students) in a way that they find useful in the digital-led, time-pressured world. If we continue to develop ourselves as knowledgeable and capable Academic Services team members, then we strengthen that winning combination of great staff, great resources, helping to create an outstanding professional service that we are proud to be part of...

About Plan S.

SCONUL guidance

This is SCONUL's response to plan S, which asks in particular how university libraries can adjust to and benefit from the plan, and what the cost implications may be.

Concerns about Plan S

Pickler, R. 2019. A New Twist in Open Access. Nursing Research. 68(3) 175-76

Frantsvag, J. 2019. Few Open Access Journals Are Compliant with Plan S. Publications, 7(2) 1-18

Some key principles

1. Date for implementation aimed for 1 January 2020.
2. Plan-S is a set of principles. Individual funders must now work out how to implement them.
3. Plan S applies to all disciplines. The term 'science' includes the humanities.
4. Access to research publications that are generated through research grants must be fully and immediately open.
5. Researchers must retain their copyright.
6. All publications must be published under an open license.
7. We understand zero embargo 'green' OA will be compliant with Plan-S.
8. Article Processing Charges (APCs) will be capped.
9. Applies to all types of scholarly publications, but the timeline to achieve Open Access for monographs and books may be longer.
10. The 'hybrid' model of publishing is not compliant long term.

CASE STUDIES

Futurelib at Cambridge

Thus project ran from October 2017 to May 2018 and which used varied qualitative methiods to investigate the student experience of the libraries in Cambridge.

The web story of the project is here.

The executive summary is here.

UX At Wocester

At Worcester three main UX different forms of student feedback were run concurrently, which quickly led to several projects which were run with ongoing student consulation.

Three new projects were developed and shaped by this process; first a new top tips for using the library poster; at the same time the library webpages were redesigned, and the idea of using a library mascot was developed.

The description of the process of UX is very detailed and useful. The link to the article is here.

UX in the UK

Southampton ran a UX project, (which looks to have been quite costly), and had a libguide page explaining the process to students.

Essex ran an UX project as well recently, and encouraged students to take librarians on a tour of the library, so that staff could learn more about the mental maps users had built...

UKANTHROLIB

This is a shared blog on which librarians share information – and observations – about anthropological research findings in their libraries. Great on how some of the UX techniques are being applied at other libraries.

A good reading list

Ned Potter has a resource list for finding out more about UX with various case studies and articles to help with further refelction.

A short explanation

User experience (UX) in libraries: let's get physical (and digital) - by Leo Appletom explains UX succinctly, and applies it to both physical and digital design of library spaces.

Interesting libguides

Libguide by Arlington Public Library in Maryland. Really interesting use of the header box as a 'take me to' list to quickly jump to other pages.

An example from Napier University of a library blog run on a libguide.

Ths libguide from Torrens University in Australia is very colourful and eye catching and very easy to navigate.

Some Design Ideas

The first 15 minutes of this video run through some excellent principles to bear in mind when creating libguides.

Student co-creators of libguides?

This interesting article casts a critical eye over libguides and their incresing use by university libraries, and suggests new models for thinking about using online guides as a way to engage students in creative research of their own rather than simply feeding them the best resources for their work.

Hicks, A., 2015. LibGuides: Pedagogy to Oppress? Hybrid Pedagogy.

Ideas for LibGuides,

Two librarians from Texas reflect here on their experience of moving to a new system of LibGuides, and how they used the transition as an opportunity for relaunching their guides, and for training those who maintain them.

They worked on the 5 plus or minus 2 principle, that guides should have no more than 5 (plus or minus 2), pages; boxes on a page, and items in a box.

It's worth a read as a good short desciption of arranging a training programme, and how librarians can adapt their material to the search behaviour of the web.

UKSTLG Conference in York: Tim Calvert

by LLS Inspired on June 18th, 2019 | Comments

I attended the UK Science and Technology Librarians' Group at this meeting on 23rd May while I was in Lancashire on annual leave. It is one thing traveling north from Dorset, but quite another for a Lancastrian to open the deep wounds of the War of the Roses and cross the Pennines. York is a lovely city to visit however, all ancient grievances aside, and the university library is really interesting with a great history and philosophy collection.

The conference was not on these subjects of course, but was aimed at librarians working to support the sciences, and in particular to look at how we achieved impact on students and academics in our work. This focus on impact meant the presentations were not as clearly science related as at the last conferene.

Service Excellence Conference

by LLS Inspired on January 22nd, 2019 | Comments

The midyear Service Excellence conference took place on 19th December. Always a very interesting day and a good opportunity to network with colleagues.

The excellent Geoff Ramm gave us Celebrity Service Take Two. He spoke of his experiences working with companies and mentioned a football hotel in Manchester that he thought had missed a lot of tricks. So in small groups we came up with imaginative ideas for our own football hotel.

It was amazing the ideas that were produced in only a few minutes. One being the theme from Match of the Day played as you swiped your room key! After this, I believed Geoff when he said that a two minute brain storming session often produces better results than an away day.

The panel who played our version of Room 101 came up with interesting Service Excellence grievances and I especially agreed with the taking out of coffee cups and relative rubbish. Very easy to think someone else will do it!

The workshops that followed with a theme of Head, Hand and Heart brought a new perspective to achieving great service excellence with interactive activities along with the presentation. Again always interesting to hear from other colleagues as to their issues and solutions.

The core message being Memorable service excellence doesn't just happen by itself. One of the PowerPoint slides gave the message that John Lewis used
